Thought of the Week

The Greek people have spoken with a resounding 61% of voters voting "no" in last weekend's bailout proposal from international lenders. We are now witnessing a Western-style showdown and Greek Prime Minister Alexander Tsipras has just improved his shooting position. Essentially, Greece now has two choices: 1) bow to the demands of the EU-no matter how restrictive and unreasonable they may seem (see: austerity measures, reforms, etc.); 2) go at it alone. All indications point to Greece posturing for door number two, however, we believe they would still like to make a deal. Like a game of chicken, the stage is now set for Greece leadership to play hardball with creditors and other interested parties. In simple terms, this is not good news for financial markets. The Greek people have set a precedent for other disgruntled European nations to lock homs with the EU. In terms of its size, though, how the Greek situation unfolds is fairly irrelevant to financial markets, when considered on its own. But the change in mindset is potentially a tipping point for Europe's political stability. After all, the euro's original charge was to bind a continent plagued by war, while also facilitating trade under a single currency. It's somewhat ironic that the future of the EU now lies in the hands of the nation where democracy was born. To say the least, the eyes of the world are on Greece, and also peripheral bond yields, which have held in decently so far (as shown in the chart below).
